The Bosnian Church

No topic in Bosnian history has been more argued over than the schismatic Bosnian Church of the middle ages.¹ It is impossible to discuss this subject without also touching on the modern myths and ideologies which it has served or spawned.

3: The Bosnian Church

- ¹ For a good recent survey of the historians' arguments, see Džaja, Die 'bosnische Kirche', pp. 1–68; an important earlier historiographical account is Šidak, 'Problem "bosanske crkve" u historiografiji'. There is a rich bibliography in Fine, Bosnian Church, pp. 393–434, which can be supplemented by further references in the notes to Okić, 'Les Kristians de Bosnie'.

RECEPTION OF JOHN V.A. FINE JR.'S THE BOSNIAN CHURCH: A NEW INTERPRETATION: INTERESTING SLEEVE OF A NEVER ENDING HISTORIOGRAPHICAL DEBATE*

Abstract. Historiography about the medieval Bosnian Church is a vast and complicated labyrinth, with many different sections and subsections regarding its teachings, where authors are least likely to find a compromise, or some common ground. Very often, the ruling ideologies have intertwined their interests and influences in this field of medieval study, causing the emergence of very intense emotions in wider circles of population. One remarkable episode in history of research and study of the Bosnian Church is the occurrence of medievalist from United States of America, John V.A. Fine Jr., who arrived in Bosnia and Yugoslavia at the peak of the Cold War. Fine proved to be a very meticulous researcher, who produced a book under the title: The Bosnian Church: A New Interpretation. A Study of the Bosnian Church and its Place in State and Society from the 13th to the 15th Centuries which immediately caused disturbance and wide range of reactions. With his aligning with the historiographical stream which doesn't see the Bosnian Church as a dualistic heretical institution, rather a monastic community independent from both of the big churches of the time, Fine gave additional fuel to this theory, a theory somewhat weakened in that period as its main protagonist Jaroslav Šidak had a change of mind. The main goal of this paper is to study the immediate reactions on Fine's thesis, in forms of reviews of his book, as well its influence in the subsequent decades of the historiographical studies of the Bosnian Church.

nia from the thirteenth century until Bosnia became a mission field for the Franciscan friars in the mid-fourteenth century. Dualist tendencies probably did exist in Bosnia, but essentially outside the main body of the Bosnian Church. The misconception that the Bosnian Church was “Manichean” probably stemmed from some minor dualist influence on the church, if not from simple confusion.

Fine argues convincingly that such an interpretation is the only one which fits with the otherwise contradictory sources. His careful analysis and weighing of the sources, their contexts, and their prejudices, suggest that he is right. Fine’s description of the Bosnian Church as a few related monastic communities, possibly of the Slavic Latin rite (an aspect to which Fine should perhaps devote more attention), serving as a “nativistic” reaction to Hungarian Catholic threats helps explain why the Bosnian Church disappeared so rapidly when the Franciscan missionaries and Serbian Orthodox clergy began to move into Bosnia and neighboring Herzegovina. Essentially a monastic institution, the Bosnian Church, unlike the Catholic and Orthodox Churches with their parish-oriented structures, could not play an effective role in the daily life of the laity and thus had little popular support. Fine’s elaboration of his thesis within the context of Bosnian history and, particularly, against the background of the anthropology and folk culture of the region, makes this study an important addition to our knowledge of the medieval Balkans.

Historiographical Debates: The historiography surrounding the Bosnian Church is described as complex and often influenced by ruling ideologies (Dautovic, 2022). Dautovic (2022) specifically discusses the impact and reception of John V.A. Fine Jr.'s "The Bosnian Church: A New Interpretation," which argued against its dualistic heretical nature and instead proposed it as an independent monastic community, further fueling ongoing scholarly discussions.

The current state of research on the "Bosnian Church" reveals ongoing scholarly debate regarding its nature, doctrine, and historical role (Dautovic, 2022; Czarnecki, 2022; Minczew, 2020).

Key areas of research include:

- Doctrinal Nature: A significant point of contention is whether the Bosnian Church was a dualistic heretical institution, often linked to Bogomilism, or an independent monastic community (Dautovic, 2022). Research by Czarnecki (2022) aims to reconstruct the doctrines of Slavonic dualism (ordo Sclavoniae) using Western sources to identify its unique characteristics and origins. Minczew (2020) investigates the influence of Bulgarian and Byzantine Bogomilism, concluding that the Bosnian Church was heretical with neo-Manichean influences, differing significantly from orthodox Churches in its teachings and practices. Conversely, Aščerić-Todd (2022) critiques the "Bogomil Theory" as a mythicized account, questioning its premise of theological similarities between Bogomilism and Islam.
- Role in Medieval Bosnian Society: Studies examine the practical functions of the Bosnian Church within the medieval Bosnian state. Dedić (2024) explores the role of the head (djed) of the Bosnian Church as an arbiter in disputes between rulers and nobles during the 14th and 15th centuries. Dautović (2021) investigates the relationship between the Bosnian Church, specifically the krstjani (Christians), and medieval tombstones known as stećci, analyzing epitaphs and symbols for connections.
- Origins and Development: The formation of the Bosnian Church is understood as an autocephalous organization that emerged in the 13th century following the relocation of the Bosnian bishopric outside its territory, succeeding the previous Catholic diocese (Dautović, 2022).

Very often, the ruling ideologies have intertwined their interests and influences in this field of medieval study, causing the emergence of very intense emotions in wider circles of population. One remarkable episode in history of research and study of the Bosnian Church is the occurrence of medievalist from United States of America, John V. A. Fine Jr., who arrived in Bosnia and Yugoslavia at the peak of the Cold War. Fine proved to be a very meticulous researcher, who produced a book under the title: The Bosnian Church: A New Interpretation. A Study of the Bosnian Church and its Place in State and Society from the 13th to the 15th Centuries which immediately caused disturbance and wide range of reactions. With his aligning with the historiographical stream which doesn't see the Bosnian Church as a dualistic heretical institution, rather a monastic community independent from both of the big churches of the time, Fine gave additional fuel to this theory, a theory somewhat weakened in that period as its main protagonist Jaroslav Šidak had a change of mind. The main goal of this paper is to study the immediate reactions on Fine's thesis, in forms of reviews of his book, as well its influence in the subsequent decades of the historiographical studies of the Bosnian Church.'

ABSTRACT

This paper is dedicated to the relations between two phenomena so characteristic for the medieval Bosnian history: one being the monastic order krstjani from Bosnia, ie. the Bosnian Church and the other are medieval tombstones - stećci. During the development of the historiography, attitudes of medievalists regarding these phenomena went through different phases, from almost unconditional connections between them, to the modern stance when it was determined that they were linked, but not exclusively.

The sources for the analysis are the epitaphs written on the tombstones, which were confirmed to have belonged to members of the Bosnian church, as well as those tombstones which contain the symbols of a cane and a book which historiography recognizes as signs of spiritual status of the deceased.

Key Words: Bosnian church, krstjani, medieval tombstones, epitaphs, symbology, cane, book.
